Start Making Plans for International Learn to Fly Day May 21

Last May, EAA members, chapters, and other aviation groups and enthusiasts introduced the wonder of flight to more than 40,000 people at 450 local events during the first International Learn to Fly Day. Mark your calendars and start making plans for the second annual event, set for Saturday, May 21, 2011.

The goal of this effort is to involve the entire aviation community and bring aviators together with those who have the dream of flight to show and encourage them to take that next step toward becoming a pilot. EAA and numerous other aviation organizations and businesses are again joining together to organize introductory flights, seminars, open houses at airports and flight schools, and other activities. (Read about last year's inaugural event.)

EAA encourages chapters to organize an event and post it to the International Learn to Fly Day online information center. Individual members can also get involved simply by taking a friend or relative up for a flight, or, as more and more events appear on the website, search for an event in their area.

We'll have much more to come as we approach May 21, so stay tuned!

District Court Settles Fairchild 45 Plans Request

Could lead to easier access to antique aircraft plans

January 27, 2011 — A favorable ruling on a nine-year-old Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) case appears to clear the way for the restorers of a Fairchild 45, the last of which was built in 1937, to obtain original engineering data for the aircraft. By unanimous decision, the United States Supreme Court handed the case back to U.S. District Court for a ruling after finding the main argument against release – trade secrets – was not valid. Washington, D.C. District Court Judge Ricardo M. Urbina ruled in AAA Executive Director Brent Taylor's favor on January 19..

Attorneys from the EAA Legal Advisory Council argued nearly three years ago on behalf of Taylor, EAA 576868, who filed the FOIA request in 2002 seeking access to the original data for a Fairchild 45. The FAA denied the request, saying he had to obtain permission to copy the plans from the owner of the original Type Certificate (TC).

However, the original (now defunct) company, the Fairchild Engine and Airplane Corporation, released the Fairchild 45 data to the public in 1955. The Fairchild Corporation, formed in 1990, claims that it withdrew that disclosure and is the legitimate owner of the type certificate, although its name does not appear in any of the FAA records.

The U.S. District Court held that:

A written letter authorizing the release of type certificate data was in fact valid authorization for the release of type certificate data.

The Fairchild Corporation claiming to be the predecessor of the first could not, in any event, restore the materials to trade secret status. "Consequently, the court concludes that the F-45 type certification materials are not commercially valuable, and thus do not constitute trade secrets under Exemption 4." (Italics ours.)
